

Merchant PCI Compliance – Video Transcript

As a card-accepting business owner, you're likely aware of PCI compliance.

But other than keeping your data safe, what exactly does this mean for your business?

First, know that if you make any kind of financial transaction you are required to be PCI compliant.

Nearly half of all cyber attacks are centered on small businesses, and with fewer resources to help cushion the blow, establishing a proper line of defense is critical to avoiding damage to your brand

Data thieves are continually looking for new ways to get their hands on your data, so it's imperative that you review and renew your compliance every year.

At Commerce, we understand that this can be a challenging or confusing subject.

That's why we employ our own compliance services department who work with business owners every day to establish compliance plans.

We view credit card processing as a shared responsibility.

As your payment processor, we're your resource to help safeguard your data and protect you and your customers from theft and fraud.

By establishing and regularly updating your PCI compliance plan, you will help prevent data breaches and, more importantly, maintain your customers' trust and loyalty.
