

Multigenerational Households Video Transcript

The American household is changing. More families are living with multiple generations under one roof.

It's like The Brady Bunch, but with parents, grandparents, and children. According to a Pew Research Study, a quarter of adults between the ages of twenty-five to thirty-four lived in a multigenerational household as of 2021. That can mean a lot of valuable family time, but also some big money savings.

Perks include sharing household expenses like groceries, utilities, internet and streaming services.

While another perk can include pooling financial resources for investments like real estate or stocks.

Sharing a home means splitting bills, responsibilities, and at times, you'll have to share the remote too.

With a little compromise, there is room for everyone to benefit. Tap the link in the bottom to learn more.
